

Remarks by Janet Kassel at the Opening Session of the WPA 18th Annual Home Education Conference on May 5, 2001, titled At the Threshold. Published in WPA Newsletter #69 - August 2001 pp. 9-10

I stand at the threshold of unknowing.
I have been here before.
My heart reminds me that just as I am certain
that I do not know where the path is leading me
I am also
certain
that I will be lifted up and carried across the abyss.

It is exhilarating to fly with the faith of a child because I can go where no one thinks I can go
and I can land
safely home
because I have totally given myself to the flight.

I am standing at the threshold.
I have been here before.
I AM STANDING AT THE THRESHOLD OF UNKNOWING.
It is not a safe place
but it's the only place I can stand
if I wish to grow.
I stood here
as I faced my husband
when I made my pledge to love him always.
I stood here
when I first held my first child... my second child
my third and I knew with assuredness that I was incredibly unsure.

Who are these people?
Who would they become?
How can I
a mere mortal possibly help them be safe and secure... become what they were made to be even before I knew they were?
I stood in this shadowy threshold and watched them grow and knew
for certain
that I could not give them over to the training of strangers.

The task of loving and holding and training

was given to me.

It is risky
and terrifying,
but that is what it means to live, and that is what I have elected to do.

This is not a feeling
but a choice
I have made,
knowing
for certain
that I do not know
but that knowing will grow out of the choice to love and discovery will happen.

Where else is this possible for me to cherish and nurture and protect but in the sanctity of my home so that one day these children will fly?

Homeschooling is so much a part of my family's life
that I barely think about it anymore in terms that can define it.
It is like breathing and walking.

But 20 years ago
I thought about it all the time.
I did not know how to describe it or to do it only that I had no other educational choice that would work for my family.
I tried it on,
one year at a time.
It was at first, an uneasy fit.

I felt watched. I felt vulnerable, all the while hoping to appear confident and calm especially in the eyes of my children.

And it was for my children that I dared to dream that homeschooling was a do-able thing.
My husband and I were living on the edge and it took immense trust.
We were living on the edge.

First we were an incorporated private school and then after 1984, when the current law was passed,
we became a home-based educational program.

Back then I was assaulted by questions from all corners:
from parents
siblings
friends and strangers.
What are you doing?
Is it legal?
What about socialization?
Aren't you depriving your kids?

I felt a deep sense of dread in social situations; would someone ask me the dreaded "homeschooling question?"

This past week I had several very different conversations.

At a town board meeting several moms were complaining bitterly about their kids in school; the current testing dilemma; the inadequate attention
students were receiving; the over crowding and of the excuses offered by teachers and staff; the critical comments, punitive tactics and other perceived abuses experienced even by those considered to be "successful."
They turned to me and said, "Oh, you are so lucky!
You don't have to worry about this! You homeschool!"

And a teacher friend of mine was lamenting the system.
He is taking early retirement.
He says he doesn't care anymore; that he isn't supposed to let it be known that he teaches to the test.
Teachers are made to teach to the test!
He says it is ruining kids and it has ruined him.
He no longer teaches to the child's needs.
He's quitting.

He says he hates standardized tests, but his hands are tied.
He says, "Oh, you are so lucky!
You don't have to worry about this!
You homeschool!"

The threshold is where we are most of the time we parent.

If we homeschool
it is always where we are ... discovering and inventing the process ... continually reassessing and evaluating.

If we are beginning
if we are ending
we are still embarking

day to day
into unknown terrain.
It is adventure and risk
It does not feel safe
but it is where we need to be.
It takes a great deal of faith and trust
and nerve and courage and support from others who are as determined as we are to keep the momentum going.

From time to time
in my life
I have had to journey into the desert.

sometimes
I feel lost isolated vacant dull empty silent
at a dead end
but it is in this desert of unknowing that I have found
my truest reality
the vibrant quietude of life

The desert
is full of life clean arid free subtle open waiting daring challenging inviting eternal risky

for me
the journey into the desert is the journey of my life a venture into the unknowing a leap into the abyss of faith a dreadful and wonderful opportunity to grow as a woman; a wife; a mother.

This is the great experience of homeschooling:
the chance to grow in ways I never imagined;
the chance to grow into the person I was created to become;
to unlearn much and to learn so very much more.

This great gift of being with my sons
day to day
has proven to me that great things are possible
in my life
and even greater things are possible in theirs.

What if I was not free to take that journey?
What if there was a law that said I could not?
What if I always had to prove myself to others on their educational or spiritual terms?
Isn't this what most people have to do?
Is this what we want for our children ...
for ourselves
to be required to perform for others to be what "THEY" want us to be?

My journey into the desert has taken me to the edge of my world.

I am always experiencing the new the uncharted
the next thing.

I am hopeful moving upwards and beyond risking daring to try being dragged
by the exuberance
of my unfettered children those who, unencumbered by unreasonable restrictions,
have dared to enjoy learning have dared to relax while working hard to become while remaining to keep while letting go.
They are comfortable with paradox and I am learning.

We stand at the threshold of the impossibly possible we stand in the shadow of greatness we venture forth always at the threshold of the next thing and it is awesome,
this journey.

Wisconsin provides an environment in which we are accountable to ourselves; we are free to define this Great Experiment on our own terms according to our own principles and beliefs.

It is process not product;
it is movement not result;
it is taking one day at a time on faith;
finding joy and satisfaction;
allowing time to work on the real things;
discovering how to love how to be.

Wisconsin has a good homeschooling law.

I am not sure how I would cope in a state where I needed the approval of the legislative body or educational system ... a system that does not value or understand my priorities as a parent.

I cannot imagine how a restrictive law would impact the daily routine of our lives.
I only can feel gratitude and thanksgiving for not having to imagine that.
I hope we can all continue to follow our own consciences and philosophies working together to maintain our freedoms so that we can all come as close to our goals as is practical and healthy;
that we can raise practical and healthy children and know we are doing the very best thing in our own way
according to our own values and beliefs.

Our Wisconsin law is important and fragile.
We need to remain vigilant.

Think of a law that you didn't do any thing about,
that you thought would never get
passed
or that you were unaware of until after it passed,
and now you need to work to undo the harm.
How hard is that to do?
How much time is that effort taking?
What are you giving up in order to cope with the loss of time and energy?
What is this effort taking away from your lives?

Think of a law
that if it were changed would radically alter your life.
Remember, it is easier to keep a good law than to repeal a bad one.

We must continue to pay attention; to remain vigilant for all our sakes.

Thank you for caring so much for your children
If you don't who will?
Who could?

Thank you for working to maintain the rights we all have;
for informing yourselves;
for sharing your insights.

We all stand at the threshold not really knowing where we are but certain where we want to be with our families
at peace growing journeying onward
toward our larger vision a greater hope

always another day
another threshold
a safer
better future
for our children. ❖
